Mr. Alan P. MacQuoid

Dear Mr. MacQuoid:

I have read with close attention your letter of 31 August concerning the Powers' trial.

In selecting the pilots for such difficult missions, individuals whose past training and other technical, mental and ideological outlook seemed to qualify them for this job were chosen on the basis of these qualifications and willingness to serve. The pay scale of the pilots is about equivalent to that which a chief pilot on one of our airlines receives today. As you know, Powers had served as an Air Force officer and in no sense can he be considered a "soldier of fortune."

I might add that you should take into consideration the fact that Powers was over a hundred days in solitary confinement without access to family, friends, his own legal advisors, or any U. S. Embassy representative prior to the trial, that undoubtedly the Soviets had drummed into his mind what they wished to come out at the trial, and this can be done and be effective even short of the techniques of "brain washing."

I appreciate your kind comments about our work.

Sincerely,

Allen W. Dulles

ALAN P. MACQUOID

[Redacted]
August 31, 1960

Mr. Allan Dulles
Central Intelligence Agency
Washington 25, D. C.

Dear Sir:

I am writing to voice my disapproval of the actions of Francis Powers in his recent situation. As one of the many that did a "little extra duty" while in the service in Europe, I feel that if Mr. Powers returns to our United States he will find a few people that won't greet him with open arms. What many have done out of a sense of duty, Mr. Powers would have asked for a few dollars.

An interesting question might be, "Can a 'black parachute' have a dollar sign?" I feel that it can't.

I congratulate you on the excellent work that you and your departments have done. I would like to comment, however, that perhaps we can rely more upon the fellows who are "damned proud" of our country and will do a lot to protect her. Soldiers of fortune are sometimes unable to follow orders.

Yours truly,

Alan P. MacQuoid
